

Precious metal flows set to rebound as Fed rate hike fears fade

We summarise how short and leveraged (S&L) ETPs have performed for August across a range of asset classes:

- Investor appetite for safe haven metals and US Treasuries eased on the back of rising Fed rate hike expectations, as improving risk sentiment boosted European equities.
- Allocations into unleveraged Gold ETCs slowed globally with net inflows of $859mn in August representing the lowest level since April.
- Leveraged short ETPs tracking precious metals were standout performers in the commodities space: 3x leveraged short silver ETPs offered returns of up to 28% as silver prices crashed by 9%.
- However, precious metals flows could be set for a September reversal with the case for looming Fed tightening fading.

Investor appetite for safe haven precious metals waned in August on the back of rising Fed rate hike expectations for 2016 and improving risk sentiment. This was reflected in weaker global net inflows into unleveraged Gold ETCs which, at just $859mn in August, represents the lowest level since April and far below the $4bn average monthly net inflows over the past three months. However, the downwards flows momentum could be set for a reversal in September as the case for imminent Fed tightening eases.

Renewed rate hike expectations also weighed on US Treasuries in August, as leveraged short ETPs tracking 10Y US Treasuries offered returns of over 4%. Meanwhile, long-dated European government debt continued to strengthen, underpinned by BoE and ECB quantitative easing. This uptrend is expected to persist in the near term with QE programmes in place until 2017 at the earliest.
